Description:

“Maybe life is what happens when a dream dies.” This line expresses not only the theme but the story line of Michael Brown’s Somewhere a River, winner of the 2015 Georgia Author of the Year (GAYA) award for literary fiction. The theme of redemption comes when Billy Burdette, the high school football hero who had the world at his feet, becomes Bill, part-drifter, part-philosopher, who finds new meaning in reaching out to others who, like him, have experienced the demise of their youthful dreams. Along the way, Bill comes to grips with the tragic mistakes of his lives and offers some semblance of grace to those around him. The novel is a slice of life from the South during the fifties and sixties, an explosive time when racial turmoil and the sexual revolution made life confusing and unbearable for a young man searching for his identity and the fulfillment of his dreams. Somewhere a River underscores the theme of redemption with restraint, without succumbing to the temptation of becoming overly sentimental over the fate of the protagonist and his evolving epiphany. I didn't like Billy at the beginning of the novel, but I grew to admire Bill as he faced his demons and emerged as a generous human being in the end. With glimmers of Terry Kay's The Book of Marie, Brown's Somewhere a River gives the reader greater insight into the shaping effects of setting upon the formation of a human soul.
